I am in the process of evaluating PowerBuilder for a project at work. I don't know the language, but I have had experience writing software in Java and C++. We use PHP for our web site. There is a language called LADEE (legacy application development environment) which I am told is closely related to PowerBuilder. So my question is, should I learn PowerBuilder or not? I would love to use something more modern and powerful like Java, but would I be wrong if I chose to learn PowerBuilder? A: Personally I'd pick a language and stick with it. At the end of the day it's just a programming language. The fact that it's easier to get your hands dirty in the IDE and doesn't have a copy protection mechanism is really just a benefit, not a prerequisite for "choosing" it. A: For my money, I would pick Java - it's the most mature environment with good libraries and documentation. A: It depends on your priorities. If you are working in a corporate environment and are restricted by what you can use, then you are better off using the safe bet - what you can use. If you are working for a customer with a specific technology requirement (no XML in powerbuilder, no adobe, no e-mail, no ActiveX) then you are better off learning the language you are mandated to use, because you can use it to meet that requirement. Otherwise, I would say that, if the learning curve is steeper for powerbuilder than for Java, then I would not do it. I think a lot of the value of programming languages is that you learn the same abstractions over and over. In that case, I would say that, since you have such experience in Java and C++, you can gain a lot of experience learning another language. Maybe you can
